Compiler’s Note

I compiled this list of conferences during the 2010-2011 academic year. Although some conferences were discovered through faculty recommendations and standard online searching, I learned about most of them through either Philosophy Updates or Philosophy CFPs (a blog which was recently discontinued). Philosophy Updates is a Google Group where calls for papers and other important professional announcements frequently appear, and I recommend that any serious graduate student in philosophy join Philosophy Updates.
I am indebted to E.J. Coffman for several insightful conversations about professional philosophy conferences. The idea for this document—an attempt at systematically cataloguing the philosophy conferences in the United States—developed through our mutual recognition that no such resource existed and some discussions about how having such a resource might be beneficial.

In generating this list of conferences, I adhered to three main criteria:

1. The conference had to focus on philosophy in some significant way but did not have to be a purely philosophical conference. In other words, conferences which were interdisciplinary were included as long as philosophy was one of the focal disciplines included.

2. The conference had to be consistently held in the United States. Due to financial constraints and other difficulties, it is often not feasible for undergraduate or graduate students to travel to conferences in other countries, and this resource is designed primarily as a resource for graduate and undergraduate students. (Of course, I still hope the resource can be of use and interest to philosophy faculty.) Moreover, the most important philosophy conferences for those seeking employment at American institutions are those held in the United States. Of course, should anyone wish to compile a list of international philosophy conferences, they are more than welcome to undertake that task.

3. The conference had to be held annually or biennially. There would have been little point in noting a conference that will never occur again. In this regard, the document is notably not comprehensive because there are conferences every year which are one-year-only opportunities and not based on events held in prior years. Unless otherwise noted, every conference listed is held annually.

This document remains incomplete in several areas. Some dates, for example, are blank, meaning I have been unable to uncover that information. Similarly, if no website is listed, then either the conference has no official website, or I was unable to locate the web page online. I also have little doubt that there are many conferences omitted from this list. However, after more than a year of compiling information, I have deemed this the final version of the document. If anyone else wishes to take this list and build on it, I would welcome it, although new resources such as PhilEvents have lessened the need for this database. Nevertheless, I believe this document be a helpful guide for those new to professional philosophy in the United States.
